ART BEHIND BARBED WIRE

Published to coincide with the exhibition Art Behind Barbed Wire about a remarkable collection of drawings and watercolours produced by two refugee artists, Hugo Dachinger and Walter Nessler, held in the south Liverpool Huyton internment camp during World War II.

Despite the lack of artist's materials, Dachinger produced a series of fascinating pictures illustrating his imprisonment, fashioning brushes out of sticks and his own hair and using pigments made out of toothpaste, earth and grass.

Although newspapers were officially banned inside the camp, pages from The Times and The Manchester Guardian were often used as canvases, primed with a home-made mixture of gelatine obtained from boiling bones.

Dachinger came to London as a refugee to London in 1939 and was almost immediately interned by the British government at Huyton before being transferred to the Mooragh camp in the Isle of Man.

Released in 1940, he became a commercial artist and designer. Nessler, who opposed the Hitler regime, fled Germany and was also interned upon the outbreak of war.

After being released, Nessler joined the British army and served in France. He was a teacher and painter, exhibiting in Britain and abroad.
