"Drinking too much on just one occasion can change your life for the worse," says Gregory A. Smith, MD, an addiction specialist at the Comprehensive Pain Relief Group in Los Angeles. Alcohol is also a factor in approximately 60% of fatal burn injuries and drownings, 40% of fatal falls and car accidents, and half of all sexual assaults, according to the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism (NIAAA). "Drinking is a problem when you notice that you've started to neglect things that are important to you for the sake of alcohol," says Keith Humphreys, PhD, from the VA/Stanford University Center for Health Care Evaluation in Palo Alto, California. When someone you love drinks too much : a Christian guide to addiction, codependence & recovery. by Parker, Christina B.

When you're concerned that someone you love drinks too heavily, it can be hard to know what to do. You may not know what to say or how they'll react if you bring it up. Regardless of why you're hesitating, when at least one of these things are true, you're not wrong for wanting to talk about it: You worry about how much or how often your loved one drinks. You make excuses for how they act when they drink. You've been hurt or embarrassed by your loved one when they were drinking. Don't lecture, shame, or threaten. If you blame them or come on strong, it can backfire. You may have better luck with a more caring approach. Try not to judge or use emotion to steer the conversation. Remember that you aren't their therapist or counselor. It's not your job to diagnose or treat them. Want more? Advanced embedding details, examples, and help! No_Favorite.
