Ancient Egyptians: Objects from Daily Life. The daily life of ordinary Egyptians investigated through objects. The Egyptians used oil lamps to light their homes. They would pour oil into a central hole in the lamp, which would then sit in a store in the bowl. A piece of string or linen would then be dipped into the oil and this would soak up the oil and light, producing a steady flame like a candle. Then people could hold the lamp without burning themselves and place it in a lamp holder or a hook on the wall. Ancient Egyptian Oil Lamp. Decorative Tile. In modern Egypt, a cruise on the Nile or a bus ride through the countryside along this great river of life can be very enlightening. In fact, if one could walk into a typical ancient Egyptian home, he or she would find many of the trappings of modern life, recognizable yet ancient. There would be mirrors and makeup, pots and pans, ovens and shelves for storage, beds and comfortable sitting areas, lighting to ward off the darkness of night and heat to chase away the cold of winter. They also worked on developing the best ships through their knowledge of aerodynamics. The ancient Egyptians were full of energy and life. They worked hard and spent their spare times with their friends and family. They were fascinated to musical tunes, parties, fishing, hunting, sailing etc. They lived in the narrow fertile banks of the Nile River. Each year the banks of the River Nile was flooded tremendously, due to which the banks of the river became fertile. An affluent man's home was divided into three parts, a reception, a hall and private quarter. They covered windows and doors of their houses with mats to ward off flies, dust and heat. Sometimes there was a room with three walls on the roof top where the family slept during summer. How different was Ancient Egypt from today?
