On December 14, 1799, George Washington died at his home after a brief illness and after losing about 40 percent of his blood. So what killed the 67-year-old former President? Modern medical experts have narrowed it down to several likely reasons for why Washington fell ill and died in a 21-hour period. But the illness as diagnosed by his physicians isn't one of those likely causes of death. Another debate has centered on the massive bloodletting and the ignored suggestion of a tracheotomy as possible main contributors to Washington's death. Morens said back in 1999 that the bloodletting likely didn't kill a man of Washington's size, and the little-used tracheotomy was only occasionally successful. In his will, George Washington left directions to emancipate all of the enslaved people that he owned after the death of Martha Washington. Of the 317 slaves at Mount Vernon in 1799, 123 individuals were owned by Washington. Martha Washington decided not to wait until her death. She signed a deed of manumission for Washington's enslaved people and they were freed on January 1, 1801. Learn More. 7. Today the Washingtons are buried in the New Tomb at Mount Vernon.
