Whaling is the process of hunting of whales for their usable products such as meat and blubber, which can be turned into a type of oil which became increasingly important in the Industrial Revolution. It was practiced as an organized industry as early as 875 AD. By the 16th century, it had risen to be the principal industry in the coastal regions of Spain and France. The industry spread throughout the world, and became increasingly profitable in terms of trade and resources. Some regions of the world Includes bibliographical references (pages 279-283). With the gray whale off the endangered list, the Makah Indians decide to resurrect the skills of their ancestors and return to the hunt amidst tribal infighting and animal rights activists. Deliberate hunting of small whales and dolphins is a growing conservation concern for many species and populations, with thousands of individuals killed in countries around the world for food, bait, currency or supposed traditional medicines and charms. Arguably the most notorious and bloody hunts take place in Taiji, Japan and the Faroe islands where dolphins and small whales are driven onto beaches or into coves, before being slaughtered. A whale hunt is conducted from a paledang, which is generally towed out to sea by the powerboats called jonsons after Johnson brand outboard motors. When the paledang is close enough to a whale, the whaling crew drops the tow rope and paddles into striking position. A young member of a whaling crew, which typically includes roughly a dozen people, often starts off as a spotter or water bailer, with the hopes of eventually earning the esteemed position of lama faâ€™lead harpooner.
