First, disaster risk management needs to be based on an understanding of disaster risk in all its dimensions of vulnerability, capacity, exposure of persons and assets, hazard characteristics and the environment. Second, while a lot has been done to strengthen disaster risk governance over the last ten years, further work is required at the national, regional and global levels to guide, encourage and incentivise the public and private sectors to take action and address disaster risk. Resilience is the ability to adapt to major changes in the surrounding world, and resilience of ecosystems, society and business are closely linked.

The Resilience Dividend: Managing Disruption, Avoiding Disaster, and Growing Stronger in an Unpredictable World (London: Profile Books), p.4. 3. Stuart Andrews & Patrick Duggan. Shocks are typically considered single event disasters, such as fires, earth-quakes, and floods. Stresses are factors that pressure a city on a daily or reoc-curring basis, such as chronic food and water shortages, an overtaxed transpor-tation system, endemic violence or high unemployment.⁸ On one level, urban resilience is an issue of infrastructure, but this infrastructure is necessarily engaged in supporting and enabling practices of life and work in a city.
