Description:

Learn the facts and debunk the fictions about contemporary families.

Looking at modern families through the context of diversity, inequality, and social change, FamilyInequality.com blogger and demographer Philip N. Cohen brings a fresh approach to the sociological study of family life. The text features a wealth of original, interactive graphics of contemporary family trends and encourages students to be savvy consumers of media. Integrated workshops based on activities from Cohen's undergraduate course give students the opportunity to apply what they learn in the book to their own lives.

The Rapoport reports note diversity in family structure. Family life in Britain is made up of the conventional nuclear family, cohabiting couples with children, the single-parent family and the reconstituted family. Bear in mind that the reconstituted family is also referred to as a "blended family" or as a "step family". The reconstituted family is often made up of divorced or widowed people who have remarried and their children from the previous marriage. Social policies such as the payment of child benefit to the mother, and the lack of free universal nursery care, has reinforced the idea that women should take prime responsibility for children. Bear in mind that social policies change over time as incoming governments introduce new policies or modify existing ones. Chapter eight of Cohen's The Family: Diversity, Inequality and Social Change focuses on marriage and cohabitation. Cohen discusses trends in marriage and cohabitation over time and the causes for these changes. He also examines who gets married as well as the benefits of marriage. Since the 1960s, marriage rates have been rapidly decreasing, and marriage rates have fallen faster for some groups more than others. Regarding racial-ethnic groups, African Americans are "experiencing a more rapid and pronounced decline in marriage rate than any other group" (Cohen 2015:262). Another trend regarding He has published extensively on the gender division of labor within families, and between men and women outside of families. He is a correspondent for The Atlantic, has written op-eds for the New York Times, and has appeared on NPR and MSNBC. You can follow Philip N. Cohen on Twitter at @familyunequal. Product details. Legal changes (the legal changes mentioned in the previous section has made divorce easier, therefore leading to more family types). Late modernist Anthony Giddens (1992) argues that greater gender equality has led to significant changes in the nature of family life. Relationships are now categorised by freedom "people are free to enter into relationships on their own terms rather than bound by tradition or family expectations." The most common lone-parent family is the matrifocal one: that is one where the lone parent is the mother of the child/children. There are several reasons for this, such as women giving birth (and therefore being the present parent if they are not in a relationship) and courts tending to prefer mothers in child custody cases, following divorces. This social trend towards diversity contradicts the established discourse often articulated in the media promoting moral panics about the family. French philosopher Michael Foucault wrote about the power of discourses. Discourses construct the way we discuss the social world, consequently discourses construct the way we understand the social world around us. Organisational diversity "which is due to different patterns of work outside and inside the home, and to changing marital trends. This category includes "reconstituted families" as a result of divorce and remarriage, and dualcareer families, some of which have resulted in a greater democratisation of domestic labour.

Social distance- The level of acceptance that members of one group have toward members of another group. There has been a growth in the number of intermarriage which shows the breakdown of social distance. Social distance is narrowing and I think that it will continue to narrow over time as newer generations grow up and are more open minded.
